Q q, Latin, Q, q, Ital. 𝔔, q, black English. Concerning the origin, power, and use of this letter, the ancient Latin writers have delivered various opinions to the modern criticks. Some of them took it to be superfluous and therefore probably were unconcerned about it, how, or whence, it came into their alphabet. Of this number were Nigidius Figulus and Licinius Calvus, who refused to use it at all. Some used c for it indifferently, and wrote pequnia, loquuntur, obliquum, and at other times pecunia, locuntur, oblicum, Vid. Silberg de Vet. Rom. Script. Hence some learned moderns finding many words of this kind; and others again judging it to be no letter, but only a combined note of cu, must consequently have supposed vulgar custom, and a shorter way of writing, to have introduced it into the alphabet. Of this number was Pompeius Festus, and long before him Ennius, who wrote sometimes cuando, and sometimes quando. Indeed custom at this day allows us to write cocus, hircus, cum, cur, cotidie, and many others, or coquus, hirquus, quum, &c. promiscuously. From such examples, and the frequent changes of each of these into the other, as in coquo, coctum, liqui, lictum, &c. which is no more than an ordinary permutation in letters of the same organ, especially in mutes of the same rank, some have not only affirmed Q to be CV combined as aforesaid, but showed us the separate parts in this figure C⊲. These wrote sometimes, qis, qæ, qid, or cuis, cuæ, cuid, which Vossius approved. Quintilian on the contrary takes the figure of this letter, as well as the power, from K, and seems to think both letters superfluous. As to the figure, it is just as probable as the former; and as to its power, nothing can be proved from that known pun of Tully, Ego quoque tibi jure favebo; because Donatus having informed us that in Cicero's time quoquus was written, it is more probable that he pronounced that word quoque than koke. My arguments for this conjecture are chiefly from Fabius himself, who tells us (Lib. XII. 10.) this letter made syllables harsh; which surely cannot well agree with the sound of k. Besides, he saith in the same place, that Q had a sound unknown to the Greeks (which it certainly had, and for that reason was not adopted into their alphabet, of which more below) and this evidently proves the Romans sounded it not as a k, but very probably as we do. But, what neither the ancient writers nor the moderns were aware of, hath not escaped the sagacity of the learned Dr. Littleton, who has deduced the figure, name, and power of this letter from ק. For as from the Hebrew Caph, the Greeks made Kappa, so from koph they formed koppa; but, finding they had no occasion for it in their alphabet, they gave it a place among their numerals, calling it κόππα ἐπίσημον. For the same reason also, Vau, not being admitted as a letter, found a place as a numeral, by the name of Βαῦ ἐπίσημον. On the very same account, tzade, or zade, or as we call it zad, was denied the favour of being a letter, but assigned a proper place in their numbers. This proceeding may plainly be accounted for from the genius of both languages. The Hebrew, being harsher, made use of four letters in each rank of the mutes, namely, of two medials in each order; the sound of the one so differing from its neighbour, as the first from the last: the two medials in the first order were ב and ו, or B and V; in the second ג and ק, or G and Q. In the third ד and ז, or D and Z. But the smoother tongue of the Greeks, refusing the latter in each order, made them amends suitable to their rank, by placing the first in their units, the second in their tens, and the third in their hundreds. But to proceed; the old Romans, whose language was not perhaps much softer than the Hebrew, though they framed their alphabet from the Greeks, found themselves obliged to restore these numeral marks to the dignity they had enjoyed in the mother alphabet. And thus from Βαῦ, or, which is the same, the Eolian digamma Ϝ made their F, that people alone of all the Greeks having learned that sound; and from the Greek Κόππα their Q. This letter, I observe, the Latins must have sounded quoppa, if the opinion of several ancient and modern criticks may be allowed, who affirm this letter to be taken in purely for the sake of its V, to give it a broader sound, as it is very probable the original ק had in the Hebrew to distinguish it from כ, whence the Greeks had their Κάππα, and mediately the Latins their K. From the third ἐπίσημον Σάμπι, which, as before noted, was the Hebrew tzade, or as we call it, zad, their ζ was taken, not from the Greek Ζῆτα; for here I am forced to recede from the learned doctor, because the Latin z hath a very hard sound, as the dental ץ hath, whereas the Greek ζῆτα was so soft, that Fabius tells us, the Roman orators were obliged to borrow it sometimes from them, to avoid using their own barbarous z, that is the Hebrew ץ, which the Greeks had not, Lib. XII. 10. and in the same place will scarcely allow ו, that is, F, to have a human sound; which surely is softer than ץ; and the opinion he had of our Q, I have shown before. Hence it is evident, that the Latin z is not the Greek ζ; and that the orator dislikes as letters all the three Ἐπίσημα: and the doctor confesses the figure of z comes nearer ץ, and the small z nearer to the final ץ, than to the Greek ζ. But to return to our Q. The figure of Q is easily made from CI, by shutting the semicircle, and obliquating the perpendicular line; and CI quoppa, differs not at all from the Hebrew ק, when, in compliance with the western way of writing, it is turned to the right. Thus at length the figure, name, and power of this letter are settled. But whereas the learned doctor roundly affirms the Greeks had formerly this letter; I cannot here but avow my dissent, since it neither appears among the Cadmean letters, nor those since invented, whether necessary or compendiary: besides, he owns the Greeks did not want it. Quintilian further observes, that they could not pronounce it, and is angry that so broad and harsh a sound should be taken into the Latin alphabet, which so embased the Roman, when compared with the Greek, elocution. I should next show its mutual intercourse with its sister mutes; but I have already made the longest preface to one of the shortest letters, and therefore shall only observe, that the resemblance and sound of this mute is nearer to that of her medial sister G, than to C or K her other sisters. For G takes V after her before a vowel, and that sometimes in the same syllable, as in lingua, extinguo, &c. as Q always doth: which ϙ, whether it be a vowel or a consonant, or neither, as Donatus and others have thought, is better sought in that letter than here. R r, Greek Ῥ, ρ, Hebr. ר Resch, from ריש a head, which its figure in some sort represents, in Syriack ראי, Roë, from which comes the Greek Ῥ, Rhô. From this letter the learned Littleton is of opinion that the Latins, whether by mistake, or design, took the figure of their R, as also the smaller r, by curtailing the larger; and that after they had inserted the Hebrew Q, and considered that the figure of the Greek rhô was the very same with their P, for distinction, an appendage, or tail, was added by them to it. But undoubtedly he is mistaking in this part of his conjecture. For we are certain from their monuments still remaining, that the most ancient Greeks had both Ῥ and R in their alphabet: witness the Baudelotian monument, and the pillars of Herodes Atticus, that famous critick and antiquary, vid. Grut. Inscript. p. 27, where we find this form R at least seven times; to omit what both Pliny and Tacitus acquaint us with, that the figure of the Latin letters was almost the same with that of the ancient Greeks. It seems more probable to me, that the Latins, observing the Greeks to have two characters for one sound, which they had not in the rest, viz. Ῥ and R, took the former of them into their alphabet for their P, judging this figure most expressive of the power of half the B, as P really is. This easy conjecture if none have made before, must have happened by not observing the ancient Greeks had R as well as P to characterize their rhô. This letter, R, is in the alphabet put last of all her sister liquids, though undeservedly, being in fact, τῶν ἡμιφώνων γενναιότατον, as Dionysius Halicarnass. calleth it; and therefore might pretend to the first place, since, though not fully, yet more of it may be sounded without a vowel than any of the rest. Add to this, that in the Greek tongue it makes a syllable pure, and takes before it an aspiration: both which privileges belong to vowels. But whether the aspiration ought to be sounded before, or after, this letter, is not agreed on: reason, and the custom of the Eolians, who sometimes prefixed ϝ and sometimes β before it, make for the former opinion; and the use of the Latins, who write rhamnus, rhetor, rhinoceros, rhombus, &c. may seem to countenance the latter. But I observe that in words of Greek extraction the Latins often neglected this aspiration, as in radix, rigeo, rosa, and in other words either omitted or inserted it at pleasure, as in raphanus and rhaphanus, romphæa, or rhomphæa. The Hebrews gave this letter the right of a guttural, never doubling it all; and indeed this sound is formed in the upper part of the throat, but so vibrated by a quaver of the tongue, and allision on the teeth, that it makes a sound like the grinning of a dog, whence it is called the canine letter: but the Romans, on the contrary, give it so soft and lisping a sound, that in writing they sometimes omitted it, calling the Etrusci Thusci, or Tusci; and especially before s; thus Ennius writ prosus, rusus, for prorsùs, rursus: which is less to be wondered at, because the most ancient Latins doubled not their consonants. Yea, the sound of this lisped r was so near that of its neighbour s, that they wrote asa, casmen, Papysii, for ara, carmen, Papyrii; and we find the termination os, as well as or, in good writers still, particularly in the prince of poets, where arbos and honos frequently occur: and labos, vapos, &c. in others. But the soft sound of this letter is in nothing more plain, than in its interposition to hinder the collision of two vowels, as if it had been little more than a breathing; as in murex, nurus, from μύαξ, νυός. But to proceed: Though the grammarians call all the liquids immutables, they are often changed reciprocally into one another; and to say nothing of the rest here, this has not only an intercourse with the sisterhood, but often with several of the mutes. First with her sister l, as from puer comes puera puella; from κανθήλιος, cantherius; and as cælulius was anciently written for cærulius, so on the contrary we find latiaris for latialis. With her sister m the instances are more rare; but common enough with n: for as from δῶρον and πλήρης are formed donum and plenus, so from μόνος Æol. μένος, and from μόνα, come merus and mora. In some words r and n are written indifferently, as in æreus, or æneus. I will instance as briefly as I can the intercourse of this liquid with some of the mutes: and first with c, as in paucus from παῦρος; with d, as in corium from κώδιον, meridies from medidies, querquedula for querquerula, from querquerus. Anciently also ar in many words was used for ad, as in arlabi, arfinis, arversus; for adlabi, &c. Lastly it is used with g, as from ἄρνη comes agna, ferere from feges. This letter is used by poets in describing motion, noise, indignation, or violence, Vid. Voss. Inst. Orat. 4, 2. R. A.

S The Latin capital is taken with very little, or no, variation from the ancient Greek alphabet, and is at leaſt of as great antiquity, as that of the Scythian bow (Σ;) and from this drawn into a ſmaller form is made s, which is uſed only as a final both in Greek and Latin, except in the compendiary note ς for στ. The Greeks have another, but leſs ancient figure of this letter, viz. C, from which the ſmaller initial and medial ς is ſometimes uſed. The Scythian bow is taken from the Phœnician alphabet without variation; as that is from the Hebrew ש ſin, by drawing it in a jacent, inſtead of an erect, form. Hence the Dorians, who perhaps immediately received it from the Hebrews, as Herodotus and Pindar acquaint us, called this letter σὰν ſan, though the Ionians called it σίγμα, ſigma, from the Chaldean סמכא ſimcha, by tranſpoſing the ſecond and third letters: which opinion is made more probable by the ſmall form of the Greek ſigma σ, it being no other than the Hebrew ס turned to the right hand in complaiſance to the weſtern way of writing. But there are ſtrong reaſons to think ס ſamech only a ſecondary letter, ſubſtituted for ש ſin, the better to diſtinguiſh it from שׂ ſchin; wherein they had done wiſely, provided they had exterminated ש ſin, which now ſeems ſupernumerary, becauſe both theſe letters ש and ס have one and the ſame ſound, as appeareth from the Ephraimitiſh pronunciation of Shibboleth. And hence we may account for the different Greek names of this letter, ſan being ſo called from ſin, before ſamech was introduced; and ſigma from ſamech, after ſuch introduction. But to proceed: the Greeks admit this letter into no claſs in the diſtribution of their alphabet, whether in honour to it, as being inveſted with a deſpotick power peculiar to itſelf, or in diſhonour, looking upon it only as a ſubſtitute and attendant on the reſt, is uncertain; but I ſhould think the latter, ſince its ſervile offices are ſo very many in declining their nouns, and their verbs more eſpecially in conjugating. For in all future tenſes of verbs baryton, and all the tenſes derived from thence, with their participles in every conjugation, voice, and mode, this letter is ſervile; being explicit, implicit, or potential, in them all. And this ſervile uſe probably may have been the reaſon why ſome among the Greeks have accounted it only an aſpiration; in which number was Plato the philoſopher, who calls it the breathing letter. And indeed we find both the Greek ſpirits changed into this letter: the lenis, as in ἔμμι ſum, ὀπὸς ſuccus; the aſpirate more frequently, as in ἅλς ſal, ἓξ ſex, ἑπτὰ ſeptem. This may likewiſe have occaſioned the neglect of it by the Romans in taking words from the Greeks, as in tego, fallo, from στέγω, σφάλλω, and ſometimes in derivatives of their own, as in pumex from ſpuma. Certain it is, that ſome learned men among the Greeks avoided a frequent uſe of it. Plato and Eubulus, two comick poets, made ſport in the theatre with this verſe of Euripides, Ἔσωσα σ' ὡς ἴσασιν Ἑλλήνων ὅσοι. And Pindar was ſo unjuſtly ſevere, that he wrote ſeveral odes without it: and the whole Spartan nation preferred the canine ſnarl of ῥ to the ſerpentine hiſs of ſ. The Romans alſo melted it ſo much, eſpecially in the end of words, as ſcarcely to be heard; inſomuch that even in writing before the interrogative ne, the comick poets neglect it, as in audîn'? credîn'? dabîn'? for audîſne, &c. and Virgil avoided ending a word with this letter, and beginning the following word with the ſame, as, Deſpectus tibi ſum, nec qui ſum, quæris, Alexi. Orators alſo forbid this in their compoſitions. The ancient poets, in imitation of the Greeks, when they pleaſed, cut it off in the end of a word before a ſhort, and ſometimes even before a long, ſyllable in the following word, as is manifeſt in that of Ennius, Egregiè cordatus homo catu' Ælius Sextus. And not only Ennius, Nævius, and Pacuvius do this, but Catullus; and even Cicero hath not altogether denied himſelf the liberty. But though in general this ſound may ſeem to have been unpleaſant to both nations, it has without doubt in its proper place its particular graces, and the moſt that is ſaid againſt it regards chiefly its too frequent, or improper, uſe. The Latins, in making ſome Greek words denizens of Rome, prefix this letter, as in ſcribo, ſmaragdus, ſtella, from γράφω, μάραγδος, τέλλω; and even ſt anciently, as in ſtlitem, ſtlocum, and that too in words of their own tongue: ſometimes they interpoſe it, as in diſcus, muſca, from δίκω, μυῖα. The Greeks alſo in Latin names of men ending in a add this letter, as Νεᾶς, Φιμβρίας, for Numa, Fimbria. In Tully's time, and a while after, this letter was doubled, as in cauſſa, caſſus, for cauſa, caſus, vid. Quint. 1, 7. In conjugating Latin verbs it is ſubſtituted for almoſt all the conſonants, as in arſi from ardeo, terſi from tergeo, vexi for vecſi, from veho, vulſi from vello, preſſi from premo, poſui from pono, repſi from repo, torſi from torqueo, uſſi from uro, verſum from verti, as grammarians obſerve; but this to me ſeems not ſo much a ſubſtitution, as a ſervile formative power given it in Latin, as I have obſerved before, it had in the Greek tongue. This ſemivowel, for ſo the Latins ſeem to acknowledge it, by prefixing e, as they do before the other liquids, admitteth after it of the mutes c, p, q, t, as in ſcapha, ſpes, ſqualor, ſtadium, but none of the liquids, except m, and that chiefly, if not only, in words derived from the Greek tongue. Concerning the intercourſe between this, and its neighbour R, ſee that letter. A.

T t Latin and Engliſh, whereof the former took its figure without any variation from the Greek capital, the latter, with a very ſmall difference from the leſs Greek character of moſt common uſe. They have indeed another ſmall t, but rejected by the Latins, in this form ϯ, which ſeems rather ornamental than neceſſary, being chiefly uſed in conjunction with the other. And as the Latins from the Greeks, ſo the Greeks borrowed theirs from the ancient Hebrew, namely the Samaritan character of the ſame form; ſave that the tranſverſe plank lay not quite on the top of the erect ſtulp, but acroſs it a little lower, thus, †: which very form is retained ſtill in the ſmaller form of the Latin, and other cognate languages; in which figure alſo it was worn on the foreheads of the primitive Chriſtians. This letter is called by the Hebrews תּו tau, which ſignifieth an extremity or bound, becauſe it is the laſt in their alphabet, as alſo the laſt conſonant in the Cadmean, and indeed properly the laſt in the more modern Greek; for φ and χ, which follow, are not properly letters, but notes expreſſive of two letters, and of no uſe in the times of the firſt alphabet, the former being then written by ΠΗ or ΒΗ, the latter by ΚΗ or ΓΗ; which may alſo be ſaid of ψ, the compendiary note of ΚΣ, ΓΣ, and ΦΣ. In the Latin alphabet only x and ƶ ſtand after it, the former of which is an abbreviature of ΚΣ, ΓΣ, or ΧΣ; the latter of ΤΣ, ΔΣ, or ΘΣ, as will be ſhewn more fully in the diſſertation upon thoſe two letters. To proceed: this letter hath the firſt place in the third rank of the mutes, which admit of changes into, and perform mutual offices for, one another. Theſe changes are indeed moſt frequent in the ſame rank, becauſe neareſt in ſound to each other. Ex. gr. in the firſt rank p is only a ſofter b, and b a harder p, as in ſcribo, ſcripſi, ſcriptum; nubo, nupſi, nuptum: in the ſecond order c a ſofter g, and g a harder c, as in tego, texi, tectum; jungo, junxi, junctum: which changes are plainly made only for the better ſound, the harder mute before a vowel paſſing into the ſofter before a conſonant; as is likewiſe done in the firſt and ſecond conjugation of the Greeks, as in λείβω, λείψω, λέγω, λέξω. In this third order, indeed, theſe changes in forming tenſes are not frequent in either of theſe languages, but in derivations of Latin words from Greek ſuch a reciprocation is very common; thus, as from βατῶ and κάτω are derived vado and cado, ſo vice versâ from ἔνδον and μύδος are made intus and mutus. The ſame is obſerved in Latin derivatives from primitives of the ſame: thus, as from madeo and video are made matula and vitrum; and, as in compoſition, for the more eaſy ſound, d before t is conſtantly changed into t, as in attendo, attenuo, and their derivatives; ſo alſo from mentior and quatuor come mendax and quadra: and we may add, that our Engliſh tongue ſometimes ſoftens the Latin d into this letter, as in at, it, what, from ad, id, quid. But as all the orders have a mutual commerce with one another, this letter, though leſs frequently, and her ſiſters of the firſt and ſecond order, correſpond: for as terebra comes from τέρετρον, ſo tuſſis is from βήσσω; as proceres from πρότεροι, ſo beſtia from βόσκημα. Nor do theſe mutual offices between this mute and the ſiſterhood hinder her good correſpondence with two of the liquids, l and n. For as mitis is from μείλιχος, ſo volo, are, is from πέλάω, πετῶ, as clitellæ from κλίνω, ſo pinus from πίτυς. And there is the ſame agreement between this letter and the ſolitary ſ in Latin words of Greek extraction, where their civilities are only mutual; for as nauſea comes from ναυτία, ſo myrtus from μυρσίνη; but in words purely Greek, t ſo far intruded into the property of her neighbour ſ, that the latter was forced to bring her writ of ejectment before the tribunal of the vowels, with a deſign to hang T on her own gibbet, as Lucian jocoſely ſays; but being nonſuited by the prevailing power of the Athenian eloquence, meditated revenge, and made repriſals by the help of a barbarous nation, who, though they left t in poſſeſſion, gave her power away to ſ, in more inſtances, both in her own and the conquered Roman dominions, than ſhe could pretend her neighbour had invaded her right in; viz. that wherever t came before the third vowel, another vowel following, ſ, under a very few reſtrictions, ſhould take her power. And the grammarians, who ought to have oppoſed this uſurpation, confirmed it; and well it was for the Greek tongue, that the Goths underſtood nothing of it, and the grammarians at that time very little; for how abſurd would it have been to have read αἰσία, ὠσίον, for αἰτία, ὠτίον, &c. which would ſeem equally abſurd in Latin, if we did not ſubmit to a barbarous preſcription. But to proceed; this mute admits after it in the beginning of pure Latin words of the liquids very ſeldom any other but r. The ancients indeed in a few words beginning with l prefixed ſt, as in ſtlites, ſtlocum, for lites, locum, &c. which is now obſolete. But in Greek words, not only l, but m follow t, as in Tlepolemus, tmeſis. In the beginning it takes before it in Greek words c and p, as in Cteſippus, Ptelon; as alſo in the middle of Latin words in different ſyllables, as in factus, captus, as not only the dividing ſuch words requires, but reaſon, for fac and cap are radical, but tus is a ſervile termination. V, the twentieth letter in the Latin alphabet, anſwers to the ſixth Hebrew letter ו, and, being conformable to that in power, is both a vowel and conſonant; but, as to its figure, it was, A. C. 306, or thereabout, thus varied, V, v, u, u, according to Dr. Bernard, in his Literature of the learned world. In the Hebrew, indeed, the vowel points determine its ſound; for they being under it make it a conſonant, as in ון ולא ושב vau, velo, viſhab, but a vowel when over it, as in יום; or in the middle, as in בני ubene. The Greeks admit only this latter uſe; as alſo our Saxon anceſtors, who commonly ſubſtitute f in the place of v, as in fif, reofan, five, ſeoven, as we find in very ancient manuſcripts; and ſometimes u, as Leui Levi; notwithſtanding which they founded ſuch words as we do now, otherwiſe no change of the figure had been made in after times. But though they gave this letter no place in their alphabet, they admitted it among their numerals; herein imitating the Greeks, who had made it a numeral only, calling it Βαῦ ἐπίσημον. To begin with the conſonant: As to the figure, it is by ſome thought to be made from the Greek Υ, by cutting off the ſhank; though the great Scaliger ſuppoſed this was rather made from that, by adding the ſtem: but it ſeems plain, the reaſon for this ſuppoſition, was his aſcribing to the Farneſian monument a higher antiquity than he ought. As to his proof from AVTVCTOC being found on a Greek coin, it is very weak; becauſe all antiquaries know, that it was not unuſual for the Greeks, after they came under the Roman power, to mix Latin letters among their own in coins and inſcriptions, eſpecially in Latin words. Marius Victorinus alſo is againſt him, and Auſonius expreſsly ſaith, Cecropiis ignota viris ferale ſonans V. But though it be true that the Greeks had not the letter, yet it is plain that they, at leaſt the Eolians, had the Name, and gave it the ſame place as a numeral in their units, viz. 6, as it held in the mother alphabet, calling it Βαῦ ἐπίσημον, as likewiſe Κόππα (90) in their tens, and Σὰν πῖ (or 900) in their hundreds; being the only three Hebrew letters, ץ, ף, ו, which they had no occaſion for in their alphabet. Nor had they the name only, but the form alſo from the Hebrew ו, turning it to the right, and bowing its body, ſo that its apperance was ſomewhat like the contracted mark ς, which therefore is now uſed for it. To proceed from the name and figure, which are only accidents, to its power, which is the eſſence of a letter: As it is now pronounced, I think corruptly, it is a mute of the firſt rank, being of a middle ſound between b and f, harder than the former, and ſofter than the latter, aſpirating B, as φ doth Π: and according to Priſcian and Donatus, is no other than the Eolian digamma. But if the digamma be the Latin F, as they will have it, and a different power make a different letter, as ſurely it doth, F and V are two different ſounds, and conſequently different letters. This is plain from our own tongue, for we neither ſound nor write knifes, or liſes, though we do knife and life. I mean as now pronounced; for it is very likely that before a vowel in the ſame ſyllable, both in the primitive and derivative tongues, it had the ſound of our w in the ſame poſition as in wall, wen, wine, worm, from vallum, vena, vinum, vermis, Vid. Scal. Not. ad Euſeb. & Lipſ. de L. L. pronunciatione. Yea, in Latin words, after g, q, and ſ, we give it the ſound of w; as in lingva, ſeqvor, ſvadeo, where v is melted indeed into the vowel following, but it ſtrengthens the ſound. That it is not purely a vowel, its reſolution into a vowel, frequently made by the poets, ſeems to evince; as in ſoluit, Catull. ſyluæ, Hor. This conſonant preceeds any vowel in the beginning, middle, or end, of words. It is eaſily changed into its ſiſter mutes, p and b: for as from ovis comes opilio, from dubius, duvius; ſo from verpus is made vervex, and from γάλβος, gilvus. Thus much may ſuffice for the name, figure, and ſound of the conſonant, in the ancient Latin. We next proceed to the ſound of the vowel, as now diſtinct from the conſonant, both in in figure and power. The inconvenience of expreſſing two different ſounds by the ſame letter was obſerved by Claudius Ceſar, who endeavoured to remove it, by introducing F the Eolian digamma inſtead of it; which in publick records obtained a while. But a very uſeful, though late, invention has applied an effectual remedy, by taking from the former the vocal, and from the latter the conſonant, power; ſo that now U is a vowel when it maketh a ſyllable alone, or cometh before a conſonant in the ſame ſyllable: and as ſuch hath a mutual intercourſe with all the vowels. For as from κύλιξ cometh calix, from μυδάω madeo; ſo from κάπαλος proceeds capulus, from κραιπάλη crapula: as from ἴβυξ ibex, from ἑκυρὸς ſocer; ſo from νέφος nubes, from σκόπελος ſcopulus. As from φύω fio, from στύφω ſtipo; ſo from γλία gluten, from χάρις carus; as from ἄγκυρα anchora, from νὺξ nox; ſo from φῶρ fur, from ἀμοργὴ amurca. As ſolvit diſſolved is ſoluit, ſilva ſilua, ſo nurvus is made from νεῦρον. Nor is it only related to the vowels, but to the diphthongs alſo. Thus from φαιὸς comes fuſcus, from καίρω curro, from λάγυνον lagæna, from ↄ ſextarius. By this letter alſo ſometimes the Greek υ is expreſſed in Latin, as duplus from διπλοῦς, Urania from Οὐρανία, u being equipollent in ſound to that diphthong, as Terentianus Maurus has obſerved, ſaying Οὐ literis noſtris vacat, quòd hunc V compleat ſatìs ſonum; which ſeems rather adapted to the vowel, than the conſonant ſound of this letter, according to the modern pronunciation. But if we admit, as we before hinted, that V in Latin was ſounded as our W, the difference of ſound is not ſo great. In gerunds and participles this vowel was by the ancients ſubſtituted for e; as ad faciundum; mos gerundus eſt; alſo in many adjectives of the ſuperlative degree this cuſtom generally obtained till C. Ceſar's time, when they firſt began to write by the middle vowel, optimus, maximus, for optumus, maxumus, as we learn from Fabius, l. 1, 7. A.
